

Building Speedier Cars

Forty Miles On Highways No Longer Considered Good Going

Noting the automobile advertisement, it is not uncommon to see certain manufacturers proclaiming the merits of their high-speed cars that they will do seventy or eighty miles an hour. Now, the automobile expert states that within the next ten years it will be possible for the public highways to run at the speed track—which will do from twenty to twenty miles an hour or more.

One may ask, "Why?"

Not so long ago reports of thirty to forty miles on the roads were considered good going, and most drivers were satisfied with that rate. But in the stress of competition, manufacturers began turning out cars of higher speed, going one or two miles faster than their competitors, although the law of the land did not sanction anything like that.

There is no law against building cars of higher speed, going one or two miles faster than their competitors, although the law of the land did not sanction anything like that.

And as speeds are greater—so is the crash rate higher.

It seems inconsistent for government agencies to push for higher speeds, and at the same time, to take the precaution of making laws to prevent accidents.

But the time must come, if ever, when it will be found that no one can drive a car safely at a speed of more than thirty miles an hour. The time must come, if ever, when it will be found that no one can drive a car safely at a speed of more than thirty miles an hour.
